

Supreme court cases on ICT and Media law online

[Luxembourg, 22 May 2008]: Caselex has started its roll-out of Supreme Court cases within the fields of Information and Communications Technology (ICT) law and Media law.

Cases focusing on transmission and content

The European Information Society has developed rapidly. New technologies and solutions combined with market forces pushing not only for the Single Market, but a global Information Society, has called for European initiatives such as the Television without Frontiers Directive, EU roaming regulation, harmonised standards, and the liberalisation of the telecommunications sector. Today, there are two main areas of Information Society regulation at European level: Transmission & Content. Caselex does now offer national Supreme Court cases interpreting this regulatory framework.

From data protection to radio spectrum

Europe's regulations within transmission and content on global networks span a wide range of issues such as eCommerce, domain names, data protection, television and broadcasting, electronic communications, advertising, exploitation of public sector information and cyber crime.

Seven areas of EU law covered with more to come

With the release of ICT and Media law, Caselex has brought its coverage to seven areas of EU law:

- Company law
- Intellectual Property law
- Public procurement law
- Competition law
- ICT and Media law
- Consumer protection law
- Labour law

"Caselex is on track for a complete coverage of EU's commercial areas of law, and our users will in the near future see cases of additional areas of law being offered within the service" states Caselex' Managing Director Stig Marthinsen.
